POLICE URGE FANS NOT TO SPOIL THE PARTY

SCOTLAND'S police forces are to mount a major operation to detect people who try to bring alcohol to the Scotland versus Norway football match next Saturday.

In addition there will be special attention paid to those who try to approach the National Stadium at Hampden Park in Glasgow under the influence of alcohol or without a ticket.

Police officers from the eight forces in Scotland will be joined by colleagues from British Transport Police in ensuring that the World Cup qualifying fixture is not spoiled by those who have been drinking excessively and who behave in a disorderly or violent way.

Buses and trains up and down the country bringing fans to Glasgow for the big game will be targeted and anyone found in possession of alcohol may be arrested and charged. In addition bus drivers and operators would be liable to prosecution if they knowingly allowed alcohol to be carried on their vehicles.

Although Scotland international football fixtures are generally free of serious disorder or violence there is growing concern that excessive drinking, sometimes during three or four hour train or bus journeys to the game, may lead to trouble.

Chief Superintendent Robin Howe of Strathclyde Police, speaking on behalf of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, said: "The Scotland team is enjoying some success at the moment and we are expecting a good support for the game against Norway.

"Members of the Tartan Army have a tremendous reputation around the world for their friendliness and high spirits. We are determined to ensure that this does not deteriorate into rowdiness or violence because too much drink has been taken by an irresponsible few.

"We are not out to spoil the party and hope that people heading for this important game will not spoil it either by carrying alcohol or having too much to drink.

"Supporters and those operating the coaches are urged to leave plenty of time for their journey as there is a possibility of them being stopped for roadside police checks."

Notes to Editors:

- The law covers trains as well as coaches and vehicles adapted to carry more than eight passengers to and from a designated sporting event
- It is also an offence to be under the influence or in possession of alcohol in and around the area of the designated sporting event
- Any alcohol found in such circumstances will be removed and disposed of by police
- At previous games British Transport Police have confiscated and disposed of hundreds of litres of alcohol – some bought moments before at off sales premises
- Police officers will have “dipsticks” to test if soft drinks have had alcohol added to them
